

The Scientific and Medical Network (SMN) is my kind of people. Based in England, it was named decades ago with an eye toward acceptance in a world that didn't have such a familiarity with consciousness, which it really is all about. Would that we in the States had something comparable, where in all our cities we'd have lively local groups with Nobel prize-winning guest presenters. I've been to their events in England and other places in the world, and, for any of you who are serious about impacting the world with a higher order of awareness, I highly recommend connecting with this organization.

One way is to become a SMN member – they have a worldwide membership. Also, you can attend the annual Mystic and Scientists Conference in April. And, sign up to stay in touch with what the Galileo Commission is doing to get science to define itself more broadly where it would include consciousness as causal. If you click the Commission links you will be awed by how SMN has recruited as participants just about every key person who's working on making this a more conscious world, some of whom are going to be guests on my podcast!

The Galileo Commission is a project of the Scientific and Medical Network, led by David Lorimer and Harald Walach.

The Commission is represented by a distinguished group of over 90 scientific advisers affiliated to 30 universities worldwide, many of whom have been active during our consultation process leading up to the publication of this Galileo Commission Report, written by Professor Harald Walach.

The purpose of the Report is to open public discourse and to find ways to expand the presuppositions of science so that science (a) is not constrained by an outdated view of the nature of reality and consciousness; and (b) is better able to accommodate and explore significant human experiences and questions that it is currently unable to accommodate for philosophical reasons. We anticipate that expanding science will involve some new basic assumptions (an expanded ontology); additional ways of knowing and new rules of evidence (an expanded epistemology); as well as new methodologies flowing from these.
